

HANNAH

It was sloppy. Not unlike my first blowjob.
I was fifteen, I had been sexually active for... I guess, two years, by that point.
I don't mind telling you that, I'm very open about all that.

Not that ... I don't spread it around. I suppose, because it comes with certain implications, someone who looks like me, saying something like that.

I guess the implication, is, I'm unstable, I have an unstable relationship with men.
(laughing) And to an extent, well, I do, I have a deeply unstable relationship with men.
As do we all.
Men included.

Did you know that five percent of startups are run by women?
Five percent. Worldwide.

So it's a little funny, you asking me why she did it.
Why she appeared to be one thing, and turned out to be something... very different.
Because, you see, we're necessarily schizophrenic.
Necessarily.

I didn't always look like this, you know.
It's an algorithm, beauty, you input A and B, A is time, B is money.

When I started out, as a woman in this industry, I deduced that in order to succeed, you had two options. You could be one of the boys. Or you could be the ultimate woman. That was easier, so I did that.

And at a certain point...

Well, at a certain point you start to enjoy it, the expediency of it. So it spirals. You become more beautiful, more... female, you put on this show, you feign stupidity, and things become easier for you. So you input more time and money into the algorithm, it spews out more beauty, and before you know it, you have everything you want. And you're ... a total work of art.

I even invented a fiction, you know, that I used to be a dietician.
A dietician.

I majored in neurology.

So that's all terribly ugly, but there you have it.
A revolution is not a dinner party.
